Description Knowledge translation looks at how knowledge created through research can be applied in real world contexts. It takes research from the theoretical stage (i.e. "that's interesting, but so what?") to the applied stage where it can be used to create real impact. In this subject, we explore the two main processes of knowledge translation - communication and implementation. This is a highly collaborative subject where the interdisciplinary group meets to engage in general theoretical discussion and practice various knowledge translation activities based on our various fields of research.

Students must be enrolled in a PhD program or program 8111 - Graduate Certificate in Researcher Engagement, Development and Impact

Learning Outcomes

On successful completion of this subject, students should be able to:

1. Integrate academic presentation experience into a coherent narrative that demonstrates development and refinement of advanced oral and written communication skills for an academic setting, highlighting relevant outcomes and impacts.
2. Understand concepts and frameworks in implementation science and how to utilise implementation science theory to effect change
3. Establish an effective research profile to build networks and dissemination avenues, including various platforms such as Twitter, LinkedIn, ResearchGate, Academia.edu etc
4. Demonstrate evidence of skills, personal attributes and experiences gained in an ePortfolio.

Subject Content

What is knowledge translation?

Knowledge translation as a pathway to building impact opportunities
Strategies for building networks, end users and dissemination avenues

Developing a knowledge translation strategy

Communicating research results and impact within and outside academia

Implementation science and how it can be harnessed to create change
